Q12_The UK Prime Minister told Parliament that: Scotland should be in “exactly the same situation” as Northern Ireland. Northern Ireland’s constitutional arrangements allow for a further referendum on Irish unification at intervals of at least seven years under the Good Friday Agreement. Scotland’s devolution settlement contains no fixed interval, and any further referendum is subject to permission from the UK Government. Do you think Scotland should have a Northern Ireland style fixed-interval legal right to hold a further independence referendum, or should the current arrangement continue?
